Hurricane Sandy's Legacy: Climate Resiliency Needed

It's been five years since Hurricane Sandy slammed the Northeast with unprecedented fury. I'm reminded especially of this as I was working in Brooklyn at the time for one of the local utility companies serving customers in New York City and Long Island. "Restore, reconnect, rebuild," was the mantra coined by a senior leader in the operations center in the immediate aftermath of Sandy. If I could go back in time, I would have added in a final line: "for the future."

Regional Recognition of Clean and Sustainable Transportation

In September 2017, Massachusetts Governor Charlie Baker announced a series of listening sessions to focus on the challenges and opportunities of reducing greenhouse gas emissions from the transportation sector. While those sessions begin on October 31, policy makers across the Northeast and Eastern Canada have been engaging, state-to-state, province-to-province, state-to-province, about the transportation sector's role in greenhouse gas emissions for a lot longer.

Most recently at the 41st Conference of New England Governors & Eastern Canadian Premiers (NEG/ECP) this past August, the NEG/ECP signed Resolution 41-4, Concerning Transportation.

plan, but red-list bridges remain problematic

NH Senate Bill 38 allows for funds from the state budget surplus to be used for local highway infrastructure projects including red-listed bridges. There are nearly 400 bridges in NH that fit the "poor" rating to qualify for use of these funds; however, adequate resources are limited.
